

ISIS Mission

1. First, we'd like to ask a few you a questions about Canada's mission against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS). Also sometimes called ISIL, this extremist group has taken control of a significant amount of territory in the Middle East and orchestrated terrorist attacks in recent months in Paris, Turkey, and Burkina-Faso, among other places.

Based on whatever you've seen, read, or heard, would you say the threat of ISIS has lately been growing, shrinking, or remaining the same?

Growing significantly

Growing somewhat

Staying basically the same

Shrinking somewhat

Shrinking significantly

2. The Canadian government has pledged to end this country's bombing missions against ISIS - part of an international military effort - and focus solely on providing military training to local forces fighting ISIS. So far, the government has yet to follow through on this plan to stop bombing missions.

In your opinion, what should Canada's role in the fight against ISIS be?

Stop bombing and do training only

Increase Canada's involvement against ISIS, doing more bombing as well as training

Continue to provide the current level of involvement in both bombing and training

Stop Canada's involvement against ISIS altogether

3. How confident would you say you are in the Trudeau federal government's ability to manage Canada's involvement in the mission against ISIS?

Very confident

Somewhat confident

Not very confident

Not at all confident

4. What effect, if any, do you think withdrawing CF-18 fighter jets from the ISIS mission would have on each of the following?

[ROWS - RANDOMIZE]

Canada's national security

The Syrian refugee crisis

Canada's international reputation

The military mission against ISIS

[COLUMNS]

Negative effect

No significant effect

Positive effect