Another international issue you may have seen or heard about is the severe economic and humanitarian crisis in Cuba.

How closely have you been following the ongoing events in Cuba?

Very closely – Reading a lot of stories and discussing it with friends and family

Closely, following the issue, and having the odd conversation about it

Not following that closely, just scanning the headlines

Not following it at all

The United States has long maintained economic sanctions against Cuba that restrict much of the island's trade and financial activity. But recently the U.S. has also been blocking oil tankers heading to Cuba. The blockade has resulted in blackouts and the suspension of most tourism in the country including from Canada. Tourism makes up a significant portion of Cuba's economy.

Some people say Canada should provide humanitarian aid as Cuba faces shortages of food, fuel, and electricity. Other people say Canada should stay out of this, because but doing so conflicts with U.S. sanctions policy.

How should Canada approach humanitarian aid to Cuba, given the position of the United States?

Canada should provide humanitarian aid even if it risks tension with the United States

Canada should avoid actions that could strain relations with the United States

So far, Canada has provided $8 million in funding to Cuba to "strengthen local food security".

Do you believe that is enough, too much, or not enough support?

Canada should be doing much more

Canada should be doing more

Canada has done enough

Canada should do less

Canada should not have sent that aid
